Personalized Medicine: What the future holds

This blog was submitted by mtkoobatian on 1st November 2012.
Tagged with IPS tissue engineering age organs nobel prize

Last month marked one of the most important Nobel Prizes awarded in the field of medicine and physiology. Sir John B. Gurdon and Shinya Yamanaka were awarded the prize for "...the discovery that mature cells can be reprogrammed to become pluripotent". The importance of this work cannot be understated. This discovery has implications which go beyond any experimental work in the lab. Instead it lays the groundwork for treating patients on a personal level.

It only takes a minute!

The Clegg scholarship is a work experience placement aimed at students from within the European Union who want to learn about medical journalism. We are looking for four students who will be able to spend eight weeks with the BMJ and Student BMJ in London between March and December 2013.

You could undertake the Clegg Scholarship for your elective, during your summer holiday, or as an appropriate part of your curriculum.

We cannot find you accommodation or help with your travel costs, but we pay all Clegg scholars a grant of £1200 (approximately $2000, €1500).

Students at any stage of their medical degree are welcome to apply, but we prefer those with prior writing experience.

If you are interested please send a curriculum vitae, a record of any published work, and a covering letter explaining why you would like to work with the BMJ, as an email attachment to Katie

Student BMJ needs you

Published: 14 Fevereiro 2012
DOI: 10.1136/sbmj.e1122

Would you like to take a year out of medical school and spend it as the new Student BMJ editor at the BMJ offices in Central London?

We are particularly interested in candidates who have clinical experience and an excellent standard of English. You must be motivated, creative, and preferably have had experience of medical or general journalism.

This full time position offers you an annual salary that is equivalent to that of a first year NHS house officer and requires you to:
